Like honeydews, these melons don't have a scent or slip from the vine when they're ripe, but they do provide several clues that tell you they're ready to eat. Look for the small leaf and stem-like curl that occur near where the melon is attached to the vine. When watermelons are ripe, this leaf and tendril will turn brown and dry. Give it a sniff: Ripe cantaloupes are aromatic at the blossom end (the end not attached to the vine). Give it a little twist: As cantaloupes get close to full maturity, a crack will appear around the vine where the fruit is attached. This is called "slip stage". When mature, the fruit will easily detach from the vine with a little pull and twist.
